

LAST WORDS

A dream that only a short while ago seemed destined to remain a hopeful vision for many years has at last become a tangible reality. Rutgers is to have a library building worthy of its increasingly important role as the State University of New Jersey. The 1952 session of the State Legislature passed and the Governor signed on April 18th an appropriation bill making available $2,000,000 for the construction of the first unit of a modern library building, which when completed will have ample facilities for undergraduate study and graduate research, both of which have been greatly hampered by the cramped quarters of the present library.

At this writing, details of the construction, including the choice of a site most convenient for students and faculty of the men's colleges, are being discussed by a sub-committee of the Trustees' Committee on Buildings and Grounds. Although architects have not yet been employed to draw up the plans, it is expected that many features already tentatively planned will be embodied in the new structure. Some idea of its spaciousness may be gained from these tentative plans which call for (in the completed structure) seats for 1,000 readers in contrast to the 215 seats in the present library, and for shelf space for 1,500,000 volumes. The Library now has approximately 400,000 volumes, many of which of necessity have been removed from the bulging stack shelves and stored in temporary quarters across the river.

It is expected that the new building when completed will have separate rooms for special functions now crowded together. Specifically there will be a microfilm reading room, a special newspaper reading room, a periodical reading room, a room for government documents, and one for manuscripts and special collections, a map room, and seminar rooms. It is also hoped that a special reading room can be set aside for current acquisitions.

It is probable that plans will be completed and that ground for the mammoth structure will be broken in the autumn. This nucleus of the true university may well mark the beginning of a new era in the history of the institution. Nothing was more badly needed and nothing can contribute more to the strengthening of the intellectual prestige of Rutgers than the building of a first rate library which is now the promise of the near future.
